

W. Julian Korab-Karpowicz

Evolutionity and social harmony

In my Tractatus Politico-Philosophicus and other books I write about social harmony and human evolution. I try to prove that happiness is not merely a fleeting moment of pleasure, but our self-realization resulting from a rewarded life. Self-realization is achieved in attaining our material and social goals, but also in forming our ethical attitudes and in developing of personal characteristics. Nevertheless, when describing social harmony, as an environment in which we can fully self-realize ourselves, I do not attempt to impose a fixed model of self-realization or a good life on anyone. I claim that it is important that each of us has the opportunity to self-realize and strive for happiness, but no one should do this at the expense of others. In this world, where wars and conflicts endanger the future of humankind, it is essential that we think about human evolution that depends on our development, intellectual and moral. So I am asking a question about our future. Is the end of history or a reset of history that await us, or a nuclear annihilation? Or perhaps, we could be wise enough to transit to evolutionity, i.e. a new evolutionary age in the history of humanity, which will replace the current postmodernity?